The French brands

The success of this brand, created by women and designed for women, is rooted in their unequalled vision of chic luxury and femininity at affordable prices. Pain de Sucre, established in the south

A "PETIT" slice of Paris located in the trendy Blubird Shopping Centre in Birnam, the shop echoes the French boutiques by making a clean, contemporary statement of uncluttered space, softly draped hangings, rich furniture and wonderful crystal chandeliers.

It is within this feminine space that the lingerie and swimwear collections are beautifully displayed.

In 2001 Leona perceived a gap in the South African market for stylish, elegant but affordable French lingerie. Trips to Paris followed to source

DURING THE past 25 years, André Hattingh established herself as one of South Africa's top clothing designers. She started her business with one sewing machine and no capital. Due to a financial crisis in the household, she decided to spread her wings from the stage and bring out a collection of clothes from a suitcase of bedspreads.

She made an instant splash, but it was an upward struggle as she could not afford a shop. She spent the first 15 years of her business selling her garments at the Rooftop Market in Rosebank and the Organic Market in Bryanston.

Her ethnic designs were spotted by the Department of Trade and Industry and she was invited to show her "Images of Africa" collection in Paris in 1998. It was a sell-out and a turning point for her.

She started her own studio in a wonderful home in Parktown North, where you will have the ultimate shopping experience.
